MR. GRAYSON, whose safe was broken open by burglars some weeks since and a few dollars extracted, has received a letter from the burglars urging him to keep a better supply of money in his safe, and saying that they were put on the job by a policeman in the city with a promise of a bribe.

A highly successful surgical operation was performed at the Cincinnati Hospital yesterday by Dr. Wood. This morning the lady was dismissed in the Police Court, while the gentleman forfeited his bail of $25.

MRS. V. P. FERRIS, of this city, has just received the sad intelligence that her husband, who was lost while buffalo hunting in Colorado last winter, perished from the cold. Mr. Fox was presented by his employees with a magnificent silver casket of one hundred and forty-seven pieces.

WILLIE played a number of games yesterday with Mr. Henry Hutzler and Mr. De Beck. We are happy to announce to all Cincinnatians, who have any local pride, that several games were drawn. This fact will no doubt be quite comforting to every true Cincinnati. To-day a "consultation game" will be played and they will give the old man a chance to air his charity again before leaving. It would be extremely mortifying to the people of the city to have him go away without having lost one game by some means.

He left his door unlocked for a friend, and this morning on his return, the above articles had disappeared. No arrests.

JOSEPH MORGAN, a fugitive from Indianapolis, for whose arrest $200 was offered, had his case continued to March 9th. He was arrested by Tom Lippincott and Officers Quinn and Ryan, and charged with stealing a trunk valued at $200 from a young lady boarder at the Bevis House, on Court and Walnut streets. New Text Book.
Robert Clarke & Co. have just published "The New Mercantile Arithmetic" for book-keepers, schools and colleges, by Richard Nelson and Henry A. Faber, of this city. The experience that these authors have made makes them most thorough and skilful accountants, both theoretically and practically, and an Arithmetic prepared by them can not fail to be valuable. Foreign Exchange, Stocks, Averages, and Partnership, are among the subjects that have received special attention.

Universalist Mass Conference.
The Universalist Mass Conference closed last evening.

In the afternoon the following preamble and resolution was offered by Rev. Mr. Bacon, and adopted:

Resolved, That the President, Secretary, and State Superintendent of the Ohio Convention are earnestly requested to call similar meetings at such times and places as may by them be thought best.

The following resolution, offered by Rev. J. G. Adams, was, by a rising vote, unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That it is the conviction of the attendants of this conference that the meetings here held have been of decided interest and of much spiritual profit, and it is our desire that they be followed up by local conferences of like character, to be appointed in the State as the executive officers of our State Convention may decide.

The evening session was devoted to a sermon by Rev. J. D. Corwin.

The President's Receptions.

Nothing could be finer from a patriotic point of view than the idea of every citizen of a nation of forty millions having on certain days of the year the right to enter freely the house of the chief magistrate they elected, and see how the illustrious public servant and his family are getting on.

For over two hours this throng of five or six hundred people walked about the house with a mournful gravity of a funeral procession, and then retired without being in the least conscious of the grotesque absurdity of the ceremony. The President, shaking several hundred hands, and having several hundred unknown names poured into his ears by Marshal Sharp, looked sad and oppressed, his evening dress, his white cravat, and his bunch of flowers in his button-hole notwithstanding. If there was any liveliness perceptible at all in this gathering it was only among the fair members of the President's family. Mrs. Grant, her daughter, her daughter-in-law, and her sister, Mrs. Sharp, could frequently be seen passing to each other in whispers little comments on the appearance of the ladies and their dresses, and with innumerable varieties of flowers and fruits on their heads, and women in walking dresses with bonnets on, as if they were out shopping. One colossal female kept ever her fur tiptop on her shoulders, probably from fear lest it should be stolen in the cloak room, and by the side of such women came now and then upon a young woman, elaborately attired in her best evening costume. When about to start for the reception I felt highly perplexed on account of a negro washerwoman in this city having found it proper to powder all my shirts with coal dust before ironing them, and the fact that the lady was richly dressed in marble. But on reaching the White House I discovered that this coal dust misfortune notwithstanding, I was, with the exception of the elegant Gen. Babcock and Postmaster Jewell, probably one of the most irreproachably shined men in the whole gathering. So when the evening was over, and the women disregarded that Col. Fred Grant himself did not think it worth while to put on his evening suit and appeared in the same frock coat, blue neck tie, and gray trousers in which he walked on Pennsylvania avenue in the afternoon. —Washington Correspondent.

History.

The return of Mrs. Ristori to the United States must naturally be a pleasure to her, and we are glad to see the feeling of that prompted her own words, uttered in a conversation elsewhere printed, "when I found myself back in New York I felt as though I was again in my country, surrounded by my friends." Other causes than the meeting with old friends and the hope of achieving new triumphs contribute to this sense of home-happiness. Alison, the historian, speaks of "that peculiar delight which has been often observed in the later years of literary men—the delight of returning again to the studies of their youth, and a feeling under the snows of age the cheerful memories of their spring." Though the great tragedienne is not old in years, her dramatic career has been so brilliant and extensive that she may be said to have the whole world for a stage and all mankind for an audience, and thus to have anticipated, in the maturity of her genius, the honors which are usually the property of age. In the splendor of such a career the artist crowds into the future the events of the past, and even the Pomona seems distant. It is but seven years since Madame Ristori played in New York, yet at that time how many triumphs has she not won? The laurels she has gathered are like "the wildernesses of fruit and flowers" in the forests of Southern America, from which she returns, yet still the Pomona and the Flora of her beautiful art have not perished but flourish in their summer youth. She will find the garlands here as bright and fresh as those she bore away.

Science.

Scientists predict that next summer will be an unusually warm one in the polar regions. It has long been observed by our American whalers that a severe winter in the temperate regions is accompanied by a unusually high degree of mildness in the region of the Arctic circle. Captain Gray, from his observations of the Arctic drift last summer is of the impression that nearly the whole of the ice was during the summer driven out of the Arctic basin. His observations, however, were limited to the coast of Greenland; but other observers have noted that the low temperature and drizzling mistiness of last summer was quite exceptional, which is supposed to be due to some unusual Arctic influence, such as the southward drift of large bodies of Polar ice and possibly the removal of some of the barriers which exist between the ice masses. The fact of the southward drift is strengthened by the fact of the unusual number of icebergs seen in the Atlantic last summer and their existence in the Bay of Biscay, an unusual occurrence, as they generally drift southward and melt in the Middle Atlantic.

The Explanation.

Mrs. Victoria C. Woodhull has written a card, in which she takes exception to the report which appeared in several newspapers of that part of Mr. Tracy's opening address to the jury in the Tilton-Beecher case that referred to her. As printed, the reports made Mr. Tracy speak of Mrs. Woodhull as "the most notorious prostitute the world has ever known." In the speech as delivered Mr. Tracy described her as "the most notorious prostitute of the practice of free love that the world has ever known," and these last words should have been printed instead of the first.

It seems that Mr. Tracy sent his speech or parts of it to the office of the Brooklyn Eagle, where it was set in type before hand, with directions from Mr. Tracy that no newspaper should be furnished with advanced proofs. Mr. Tracy afterward, in actually addressing the jury, changed his mind as to the words referring to Mrs. Woodhull, not deeming it prudent to employ his original phraseology; but he failed to notify the Eagle of the change, and he is responsible for the attack on Mrs. Woodhull which he thus set out.

For some time past the French press has been frequently giving accounts of suicides, an epidemic not only prevalent among the civil population, but also in the army. The Commander-in-Chief of the French army, General Faidherbe, is now ordering the execution of a severe decree, ordering the execution of a severe decree, ordering the execution of a severe decree.

"The soldier," he says, "who puts an end to his life is guilty of an act of cowardice. His life belongs to God and to his country." The General has decided that every soldier who commits suicide shall be buried at night without military honors and without an escort.

A Parisian who attempted to hang himself, but was cut down in time to save his life, gives this account of his sensation: "I had the sensation of receiving a blow from a hammer on the top of my head. I did not feel the rope, and I did not feel the sensation of strangling. I had the sensation of a heavy weight in my head. My head seemed heavier and bigger than the great bell of Notre Dame. It was night all about me, and then there came a terrible cold in the lower part of my body, and then a sharp pain where the rope was tearing my neck, and then nothing."

A German named Taehman, residing at St. Louis, is the victim of a singular form of insanity. The playing of music excites him to frenzy, and at certain times he expresses a desire to murder the performing musician. Another phase of his insanity is his constant belief that he is upon the verge of delirium. Taehman was formerly employed as an attendant on the philanthropist, Mr. James Lick, a part of his duties being to rub the invalid with bare hands, and to a loss of vital forces during the process the present misfortune is attributed.

When spectacles were first introduced it was considered fashionable to wear them, even by people who were not in the least near-sighted. In Spain they formed part of the costume of every well-bred person. The glasses of spectacles were proportioned in size to the rank of the wearer. Those worn by the Spaniards were large and huge, and one of the Marquis of Astora, Viceroy of Naples, after having his bust sculptured in marble, particularly enjoyed the artist not to forget his beautiful spectacles.

Ice Adventures.

A Riverside (Mass.) correspondent, in telling of the break-up of the ice in the Housatonic, says:

The night, set in dark as pitch, and there was little change in the river. At nine o'clock the first crash came. Lanterns were hastily lighted, and we ran down to our nearest neighbor, William Upson, just in time to get his two cows out of the barn. His boat was also rigid in sailing order, and five minutes after the alarm was given the river had risen six feet, and the house and barn were surrounded. The four inmates of the house were brought away in the boat, rather against their inclination, as no previous flood had been high enough to disturb them. Before morning, however, the ice was as high as the eaves of the house, pushed it off the foundation, and pretty thoroughly demolished the lower story.

The rush at nine o'clock brought the ice about twenty-five feet higher, two feet higher than ever before. At ten o'clock we were again called out. The night was still inky black, but the rushing of the ice and the crashing of buildings and trees told plainly what was going on. In ten minutes all was still again, with the water twenty-five feet high.

A visit to our neighbor above found him with his family in the barn, the house being flooded. They accepted an invitation to warmer quarters, and with a sentry on guard we once more turned in.

At three A. M. the cry "Here she comes again" brought us out in a twinkling. The moon was now shining, and for the first time we had a good view of the river. The ice now averaged thirty feet in height, and from five hundred to two thousand feet in width, according to the width of the valley. This immense body of ice and water was moving forth with seemingly irresistible force. Trees that had withstood the floods of scores of years, with others that were heretofore above the reach of floods, were shaking and crashing on all sides. The pounding of the great masses of ice, as they crashed between the banks shook the earth so that houses not touched by the ice trembled as though in an earthquake, and in some places the ice carried under, threw up hillocks forty feet high. Slower and slower it moved, and finally came to a stand just in time to prevent our house being surrounded.

Not did we realize the condition of affairs. The next house below is destroyed, and the next above submerged nearly to the eaves. The next, Mr. James Dillon's, was entirely surrounded, and in answer to the hail, "house ahoy!" Mr. Dillon stuck his head from the chamber window and reported all hands safe, but said that some of the newspapers of his barn were drowned. No ice ever came within thirty rods of Mr. Dillon's house before and he was caught napping. A little further up we met Mr. and Mrs. Curtis, who had come from an island on which their house and the church was situated.

At the place where Zeor bridge was a store was turned around, and the ice and water had swept right through the lower story, so that it looks like a horse shed. The dwelling house is also well smashed up. Mr. N. French's blacksmith shop is completely destroyed. There is at least a mile and a half of road covered with ice, varying in depth from two to twenty feet, so that it is impossible to clear it out.

As far as the eye can reach the river and the valley are one complete gorge of ice, which is heaped in uneven, fantastic masses, and which bids fair to remain there until some time in the summer. It is said that the valley is now packed for ice, and it would be a pity if there would be no danger of an ice famine in this vicinity for years to come. About two years ago a similar freshet occurred, and roads had to be cut through the ice, which remained there until July.
